

Funeral Arrangements

Your funeral is the last time your family and friends will gather to remember you.

Some people have very specific wishes about how that should happen. Others don't care and just want their family to do whatever feels right. Both approaches are fine.

But if you do have preferences - about burial vs cremation, religious service vs secular celebration, big gathering vs small and intimate - this is the place to write them down.

By documenting your wishes, you're taking the pressure off your family. They won't have to guess what you would have wanted, and they won't argue about it while they're grieving.

Burial or cremation?

This is the first big decision.

Burial means your body is placed in a coffin and buried in a cemetery or natural burial ground. You'll usually need a burial plot (if you don't already have one). Prices vary a lot depending on the cemetery, location and type of plot, and they change over time, so it's worth getting a current quote from a few providers.

Cremation means your body is cremated and your ashes are returned to your family. They can scatter your ashes, keep them in an urn, bury them, or place them in a columbarium (a memorial wall for ashes). Cremation is often cheaper than burial, but costs vary between providers and change over time, so it's worth asking a funeral director for a current quote.

Some people also choose green or natural burials (biodegradable coffin, no embalming, native bushland burial site) or donation to medical science (your body is used for medical research or training).

What kind of service do you want?

Funerals can take many forms. Here are a few common options in Australia:

Traditional funeral service: A formal service at a church, funeral home, or chapel, followed by burial or cremation. Usually includes a eulogy, hymns or music, and a gathering afterwards.

Memorial service: A service held after the body has been buried or cremated. Often less formal, and can be held weeks or even months later.

Celebration of life: A less formal gathering focused on celebrating your life rather than mourning your death. Music, stories, photos, and sometimes food or drinks.

Graveside or crematorium service: A short service at the burial site or crematorium, often just family and close friends.

Direct cremation or burial: No service at all. Your body is cremated or buried without a gathering. Some families hold a private memorial later.

Religious or secular?

If you follow a particular faith (Catholic, Anglican, Jewish, Muslim, Hindu, Buddhist, etc.), your family will likely assume you want a religious service. But if you don't, make that clear.

If you're not religious, you might want a secular celebrant to lead the service instead of a clergy member.

What about the details?

If you have specific requests for your service, write them down. Things like:

Music: Do you want specific songs played? Live music or recorded?

Readings or poems: Is there a particular piece of writing you'd like read?

Eulogy: Who should speak about your life? (Or do you want to write your own eulogy and have someone read it?)

Dress code: Formal or casual? Black or colourful?

Flowers: Do you want floral arrangements, or would you prefer donations to a charity instead?

Wake or reception: Do you want people to gather after the service? If so, where?

What happens to your body before the funeral?

In Australia, most bodies are either embalmed (preserved with chemicals) or kept in refrigeration until the funeral. Embalming is common if there's a viewing or if the funeral is delayed, but it's not required.

If you have strong feelings about embalming (some people prefer not to for religious, environmental, or personal reasons), note that here.

Have you prepaid for your funeral?

Some people prepay for their funeral to lock in costs and relieve their family of the financial burden. If you've done this, your executor needs to know.

Prepaid funerals in Australia are usually managed through a funeral bond (an investment held by a funeral director) or a prepaid funeral plan (you pay upfront and the funeral home guarantees the service).

If you've prepaid, include the details here: which funeral home, what's covered, and where the paperwork is.

WHY THIS MATTERS

Funerals can be a significant expense for your family, and the cost varies a lot depending on the type of service you choose. A funeral director can give you a current estimate.

By writing your wishes down (and prepaying if it suits you), you take the guesswork away and can ease the financial pressure on your family at a hard time.

That's a gift.
