Different is
your superpower

In a cozy barn, warm and bright,
A little piglet saw the light.
But unlike the others, with a pretty pink hue, this piglet's color
was bright, bright blue.

The other little piglets laughed and stared, for his bright blue color was what they feared. He felt so sad, he felt so small, He didn't feel like he belonged at all.

"I'll run away," the piglet sighed,
"To find a place where I won't be denied."

And so he left, with a heart so brave, to find the friends he so did crave.

He came across a tall stable
bright, full of horses, which was such a sight!

But the horses laughed and neighed in surprise, at the little blue piglet with sad, sad eyes.

Hurt and crying, he ran away,
searching for another place to stay.

He found a pond with ducks so proud, but their quacking grew louder than loud.

They chased him off, with their loud noise, so he ran away, for here he could not stay.

Next, he met a flock of fluffy sheep, but they too laughed and made him weep.

He wandered further, feeling low,
until he saw some goats in a row.
But they laughed and mocked him
for the way he looked, so he ran again until he came to a brook.

Feeling tired and very down,
he crossed over a bridge into
another town.

A flock of geese, honking in surprise, laughed at the blue piglet with teary eyes.

He ran away, feeling sad and blue, and thought for a while, what he should do.

Again he took to the road, dusty and long, and met a family of foxes, sitting down.

They were startled, and they laughed too, at the little piglet who was bright, bright blue. So he ran further, again feeling low, wondering why everyone treated him so.

Next, he met a herd of cows,
eating grass with their heads
bowed down.

But they booed at him for being so blue, so he ran away, not knowing what to do.

He came across a haystack, where puppies played, he thought he found new friends, and so he stayed. But their mother came along and interrupted their play, she barked and chased the little blue piglet away.

Wandering further, down the lane,
the little piglet felt the strain.
But then he saw a bird bright and pink, with a long neck, having a drink.

Next, he saw a dog that looked like a sheep, standing with a small pony, his heart did leap. There was also a red panda, and a blue peacock too, they were an odd colorful animal crew.

They were excited, happy, and bright, seeing the piglet was such a delightful sight.

"Do you think I look funny?"
Asked the blue piglet looking dim, they laughed with joy, but not at him.

"We love your color, it's unique and grand, join us, we perform in a circus band!"

The little blue pig felt so amazed, these new friends brought a brighter day.

They welcomed him with open arms, his color was now his biggest charm.

In the circus, he found his place, with a big smile on his happy blue face.

They performed together, night and day, in a colorful, joyous, wonderful way.

The little blue piglet played the flute, until the stars at night began to shoot.

He realized with all his might, that being different made him stand out and shine so bright.

He danced with the pony, and flew with the peacock bird, his new friends' laughter was the best he'd ever heard.

They loved him for who he was inside, with them, he no longer had to hide.

The red panda did a funny jig,
while the little blue piglet did a dancing jig. "I am so grateful to finally have a place, where everyone
moves at their own unique pace.
A place full of kindness, no judgment
or fear, where I am free to be me without shedding a tear," said the little blue piglet.

In the circus, he found his groove,
with friends who loved his every
move.

No longer sad, no longer blue,
he found his place with friends
that saw him through.

No longer scared and always running in fear, the little blue piglet
now had all his new friends near.
