

EXECUTIVE LEADER

The Extroverted Team Captain

Overview

- You are a natural leader!
- You have a knack for rallying the troops, making sure everyone feels supported, and cheering on the team.
- As an Executive Leader, you are likely known for your outgoing and social nature, which can be a great asset in business.
- Your outgoing nature can also sometimes be perceived as overbearing or dominating, which can be a weakness in certain situations.

The ability of Executive Leaders to connect with people on a personal level fosters a positive work culture and encourages collaboration, innovation, and teamwork within an organization. However, be mindful that your outgoing nature may sometimes be perceived as overbearing or dominating, overshadowing the ideas and contributions of others. Strive to strike a balance between leading and empowering team members to ensure everyone's voices are heard and valued in collaborative environments.

Common Weaknesses: The Executive Leader's extroverted nature can sometimes result in being overly dominant or controlling in a team setting. Their enthusiasm and drive to lead might overshadow others' voices, leading to potential conflicts and reduced collaboration within the organization.

Leveraging the Strength as an Entrepreneur: As an entrepreneur, the Executive Leader possesses the natural ability to inspire and motivate others, making them exceptional team builders. To harness their strength, they should actively cultivate a collaborative and inclusive work culture. By empowering their team members, delegating tasks, and actively listening to diverse perspectives, they can create a dynamic and supportive environment that fosters creativity and innovation.
