

As we enter the vibrant holiday season, Black Women Authors (BWA) extend our heartfelt wishes to you and your loved ones. This time of year brings a special blend of reflection, joy, and celebration, and we are grateful to share it with a community as inspiring and powerful as ours. Amidst the festivities, may you find moments of peace, creativity, and connection. Whether you're writing your next chapter, promoting your work, or simply taking time to rest, we hope this season fills your spirit with warmth and renewed purpose. From our BWA family to yours, we wish you joy, abundance, and a beautifully blessed holiday season.

"Graduate Reintroductions
at Homecomings"

By Omar Tyree

Back in late October at Howard University's annual homecoming celebration, I was out on the yard selling and signing books when it struck me that many of the young students there didn't have the slightest idea of who I was or who else they could have been around on the yard. And there were plenty of older graduates out there like every year. In fact, imagine the human brain power at any university's homecoming. That's a lot of experience to learn from. If we ever learn to utilize it.

That's the whole point of an education, to learn from those who learned before you, and then pass it on. Hopefully that's still the intention of being educated. But sometimes we get caught up just trying to survive in life. That's how we become detached, with each person worried about his or her own survival. And if we're not successful in arriving at where we feel we're supposed to be, we can end up running around in circles, like a cat chasing after its own tail.
